

Westward Rails

This cube rails game designed by Travis D. Hill is a rather charming and winsome take on the genre, in which players auction shares, extend track, upgrade metro areas, and chase after connection bonuses - resulting in bigger and bigger dividends. Gorgeous art by Donal Hegarty.

Description

This new train game from designer Travis D. Hill (Union Station, Reunification) harkens back to the feel of the classic cube rails games of the aughties. Players win shares of railroads at auction, and any shareholder is able to build track for that company across a point-to-point map - one that's been beautifully realized by artist Donal Hegarty. Every action you take has the potential to increase a company's value, and as they reach certain thresholds, they pay out dividends. Companies can work together to connect specified pairs of cities, or race to be the first to reach valuable metro areas.

But build and auction carefully! At the end of the game, shares are worthless - it's only cash on hand that matters in the final tally. Every dollar counts in this charming and winsome game.
